Train Exhibit

By Bethany Wan

From little people to tiny hot air balloons, the Train Exhibit at Carnegie Science Center is one of my favorite exhibits.

There are little trains that run through the whole village. First off, you start at the winter side where little people are all bundled up. The tiny trees are all covered with "snow".

As you move on, it starts to turn into spring. There are little children swinging on the swing that rocks back and forth. There are men swinging their axes at trees.

Moving closer to the end, you'll see the seasons changing again. It turns from spring to summer where there is a baseball field packed with tiny people. The people are actually cotton swab heads! There are 23,000 cotton swabs and they were all hand painted.

Then it goes to fall where farmers are out harvesting their crops. Little workers are building a tiny house. Finally, as you move around the train table it's winter again and the carnival is open. There is a giant ferris wheel with little people inside. The roller coaster is fast and tiny children are holding big clouds of cotton.
